Homeownership includes two fundamental utilities: consumption and investment. When buying a home, most households would consider maximizing both utilities: does the house provide satisfactory shelter for the family and how much appreciation in value can be expected. We show that these two utilities have conflicting natures and elaborate that such a conflict can exacerbate housing bubbles.

Refreshments will be served at 1:30 p.m.